The italian company "9Proof" is soliciting software products, pledging security features for IT infrastructures. To use such products, you need to have a lot of confidence not only in the software, but also in the producing company and their professionalism. And that's where headache begins...

Parts of their software is being developed by freelancers in foreign countries, which is not too unusual in this business. But what is alarming is the fact that they have an extremely strange discipline with these dealings - there are developers not being paid for their work, emails and registered letters stay unanswered, hoping that the developer is frightened of the imminent legal fees and extensive efforts for court action in a foreign country. So much for confidence and professionalism.
